EXPLANATORY NOTES

This publication presents in detail the export and import trade in unmanufactured cotton from 1921-1935, for all countries in which such trade is significant. As of additional value, average exports and imports for 1909-1913 have also been included in the summary tables (Tables 1-3). These statistics have been taken from the official publications of the various countries, supplemented in a few cases by reports from United States representatives abroad.

In countries where export and import statistics are reported as net weight, original units have been converted to bales of 478 pounds net, in other countries where gross weight is used, original units have been converted to bales of 500 pounds gross. It is recognized that all cotton on a gross weight basis does not contain exactly 22 pounds of tare per 500 pounds but differs materially for different growths of cotton. However, in the absence of sufficient data with respect to the percentage of tare for different types or growths, the allowance of 22 pounds of tare to 500 pounds gross weight has seemed best for the purposes of this report.

Statistics covering exports from one country to another cannot be expected ordinarily to balance with statistics covering imports as taken from the reports of the importing country, although in the case of some countries the discrepancies tend to cancel over a period of years. By far the most important reason for differences is the fact that much cotton moves from the original exporting country to the country of ultimate consumption through intermediate countries.

For example, discrepancies between United States export figures and foreign import figures, arising from transshipment trade, are particularly evident in the statistics covering the cotton trade between the United States and Germany. Much of the cotton which is represented in United States figures as exports from the United States to Germany, is in actual practice transshipped from Germany to other European countries, particularly those of Central Europe. This results in over-statement of United States exports to Germany, and understatement of United States exports to the countries of ultimate destination. At present this difference in United States and German figures is less than previous years, particularly in view of the fact that much of the cotton that formerly was shipped to Poland via Germany is now shipped directly to Polish ports.

The raw cotton exports reported by western European countries, such as Germany and France, which do not grow cotton, represent, of course, reexport of imported cotton.

The statistics included in this publication cover calendar years, with the exception of those for the following countries, which are for years ending on the specified dates -

(1) United States, July 31
(2) British India, July 31
(3) Egypt, July 31
(4) Iran (Persia), June 21
(5) Canada, March 31

Data for both British India and Egypt were compiled on the basis of years ended July 31 in order that the statistics of those important cotton exporting countries might be comparable to the United States cotton year. Corresponding data on a July 31 year are also desirable for other countries but are not available in detail on other than calendar years.

When reported as "general" and "special" trade, statistics for "special" trade have been taken as more nearly representing cotton retained for consumption than do statistics taken from the "general"figures, which ordinarily represent total imports whether for consumption or reexport.

So far as possible the figures refer to ginned or lint cotton and do not include linters. Statistics for linters are shown as separate tables. For countries which report both ginned and unginned cotton, the unginned has been converted to ginned. (1 pound ginned equivalent to 3 pounds of unginned.) For countries in which it is reported simply as cotton, it has been assumed to be ginned.

As it is not planned to republish these data in the near future, space has been provided for inserting later figures. Some of these will be published from time to time in Foreign Crops and Markets, a weekly mimeographed publication and World Cotton Prospects, a monthly mimeographed publication, issued by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

STATISTICS RELATING TO THE INTERNATIONAL TRADE IN COTTON.

Summary

Cotton is the most valuable single agricultural product entering the channels of world trade. World exports during recent years have averaged between 12,000,000 and 13,000,000 bales annually. Net exports from all the principal producing areas during the last five years, 1931-1935, averaged 12,227,000 bales. This figure represents a decline from the 1926-1930 average when net exports stood at 12,999,000 bales, but an increase over the 1921-1925 average of 11,317,000 bales. It is slightly below the 1909-1913 average of 12,522,000 bales.

The United States, British India and Egypt, the three largest cotton exporting countries, supplied 95.9 percent of the world cotton exports during the five years, 1909-1913, preceding the World War. During the last 5 years for which data are available,1931-1935, approximately 90.7 percent of the cotton entering into international trade came from those sources. In recent years, exports from South American countries, particularly Brazil have shown a substantial increase but their proportion of world exports is still comparatively small. China and Russia are large producers of cotton, but production has ordinarily been inadequate to meet domestic requirements and until very recently both of these countries have been substantial importers of cotton.

Exporting Areas.

The United States occupies the leading position among cotton exporting nations, supplying 60 percent of all the cotton entering into world trade over the five years from 1931 to 1935. However, the position of the United States during this recent period is relatively less important than before the World War or than during the 5 year period, 1926-1930, although higher than the 1921-1925 average. In 1909-1913, 68.8 percent of the world cotton exports came from the United States, 15.6 percent from British India, 11.5 percent from Egypt and only 1.4 percent from South American countries. Over the last five years, the United States supplied 60 percent of the total, British India 17.5 percent, Egypt 13.2 percent and South America 5.3 percent.

Average net exports from the United States, which amounted to 8,012,000 bales in 1926-27 to 1930-31, dropped to an average of 7,336,000 bales during 1931-32 to 1935-36, a decline of 8 percent. In comparison with the five prewar years, there was a decline of 15 percent.

The peaks of the United States export trade in cotton during the postwar years were reached in 1926-27 and in 1931-32 when net exports amounted to 10,900,000 bales and 9,081,000 bales, respectively. From 1931-32 to 1934-35 the trend was downward, exports declining to 4,925,000 bales in 1934-35, the smallest figure in more than a decade. Some of this loss was regained in 1935-36, when net exports rose to 6,099,000 bales.

British India ranks next to the United States as an exporter of cotton, average net exports during 1909-10 to 1913-14 amounting to 1,957,000 bales. Though subject to considerable fluctuation, India's cotton exports have increased slowly, and during the last five years have averaged 2,133,000 bales.

Egypt is the world's third largest exporter of cotton, but of the periods covered in this publication, only the figures for the last five years show any noticeable gain. Average exports for 1931-32 to 1935-36 amounted to 1,620,000 bales, while prior to 1930-31, exports showed little variation on the basis of the 5 year averages, amounting to somewhat less than 1,500,000 bales in 1909-1913, 1921-1925, and 1926-1930.

Exports of cotton from South American countries have gradually increased since pre-war years, and have shown a sharp upturn within the past two or three years. The combined exports from Brazil, Peru and Argentina, which averaged 166,000 bales during 1909-1913, rose to an average of 299,000 bales during 1921-1925, and 657,000 bales during the last five years, 1931-1935. Exports from these three countries, which totalled 418,000 bales in 1931, increased to 1,006,000 bales in 1934 and to 1,138,000 bales, or more than 9 percent of the world total, in 1935.

During the last five years, 1931-1935, average exports from Brazil amounted to 273,000 bales. This was double the amount sent abroad during 1926-1930 and more than three times as much as was exported before the World War. Exports in 1935 amounted to 630,000 bales, a peak figure, and in 1934 to 584,000 bales, the highest up to that time.

Average net exports from Peru, which before the World War, 1909-1913, amounted to 83,000 bales annually, increased to 223,000 bales in 1926-1930 and in 1931-1935 to 258,000 bales.

Net exports of raw cotton from Argentina also show an upward trend, rising from 11,000 bales in 1921 to 167,000 bales in 1935.

Certain of the newer cotton producing countries of Africa have also made considerable progress in increasing their export trade in cotton. Kenya and Uganda, which during the five prewar years exported an average of 16,000 bales, exported an average of 91,000 bales in 1921-1925 and in 1933 had reached a record export figure of 248,000 bales. During the last five years, 1931-1935, exports from the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan have averaged 131,000 bales, as compared to an average of only 12,000 bales during the prewar years of 1909-1913.

Importing areas

The major cotton importing countries are located in western and central Europe and the Far East. The United Kingdom, Germany, France and Italy comprise the leading cotton importing countries of Europe, accounting for more than 70 percent of total European net imports of cotton over the 15 years from 1921 to 1935. In the Far East, Japan and China are the two important cotton importing countries.

In comparing prewar and postwar figures, covering world cotton trade, a marked shift in the distribution of cotton imports, as between Europe and the Far East, will be noted. In the prewar years of 1909-1913, the European countries accounted for net imports averaging 11,094,000 bales annually while Japan imported an average of 1,405,000 bales and China was on a net export basis. In contrast, in the five years from 1931-1935, Europe imported an average of 8,170,000 bales while Japan and China imported an average of 4,006,000 bales of which Japan accounted for 3,440,000 bales and China 566,000 bales. Expressed on a percentage basis, the European countries took during the prewar years, 1909-1913, 87.7 percent of the world's net cotton imports while Japan took 11.1 percent; in 1931-1935 the European countries took only 65.7 percent of the world's net cotton imports while Japan took 27.7 percent and China 4.6 percent.

The United Kingdom retains first place among the European countries as a cotton importing nation, but since 1929 has ranked second to Japan among all cotton importing countries. Since the close of the World War, annual British net imports of cotton have never equaled the 1909-1913 average, which amounted to 4,164,000 bales. During 1931-1935, net imports of cotton by the United Kingdom averaged 2,509,000 bales. This figure is considerably below the average net imports for the five preceding years, 1926-1930, which were 2,950,000 bales, and the postwar years of 1921-1925 when such imports averaged 2,824,000 bales. Before the War, the United States supplied approximately four-fifths of all the cotton imported into the United Kingdom while in 1926-1930 the United States supplied 57 percent and during 1931-1935 47 percent of the total imports. Increases have been shown in 1931-1935, over 1926-1930, in imports from British India, Brazil, Argentina, and minor suppliers.

Aside from imports for consumption, the United Kingdom imports considerable amounts of cotton for reexport to other European countries. However, this reexport trade in raw cotton shows a tendency to decline. Average annual reexports before the World War, 1909-1913, amounted to 585,000 bales. In 1921-1925 these reexports dropped to an average of 259,000 bales and in 1931-1935 had decreased to an average of 120,000 bales.

In 1931-1935 Germany regained its prewar position of second place among European cotton importing countries, after having been superseded in this position by France in the periods from 1921-1925 and 1926-1930. Because of territorial differences figures covering imports of cotton into Germany since the World War are not comparable with the prewar figures. However, the peak of Germany's net imports in recent years, a figure of 1,890.000 bales reached in 1927, was not greatly below the average net imports of 2,025,000 bales in 1909-1913. In 1931-1935 Germany's net imports of cotton averaged 1,341,000 bales, a decline from 1926-1930 when imports averaged 1,469,000 bales, but a substantial increase over the average of 1,082,000 bales during the postwar years of 1921-1925.

In addition to its large imports for consumption, Germany engages in an important reexport trade in cotton, principally to Poland, Czechoslovakia and other Central European countries. However, this transshipment trade has declined considerably from the peak of 400,000 bales reached in 1930, principally due to the fact that most of the cotton formerly shipped to Poland via Germany now goes directly to Polish ports. Prior to 1929, the United States usually supplied about 80 percent of Germany's total imports of cotton but its share has declined sharply in recent years, amounting to 60 percent in 1934 and 24 percent in 1935. Total imports in 1935, including cotton for transshipment, amounted to 1,430,000 bales of which the United States supplied 345,000 bales, Brazil 380,000 bales, Egypt 181,000 bales and British India 129,000 bales.

Net imports of cotton into France averaged 1,156,000 bales in 1931-1935, a figure roughly equivalent to the 1909-1913 average of 1,123,000 bales and the 1921-1925 average of 1,170,000 bales, but substantially below the 1926-1930 figure of 1,972,000 bales. Approximately 60 percent of total imports of cotton during the last five years, 1931-1935, came from the United States as compared to 62 percent in 1926-1930 and 66 percent of 1921-1925 imports.

As in the case of France, net imports into Italy in recent years, 1931-1934, which averaged 884,000 bales, have practically duplicated the prewar, 1909-1913, imports of 857,000 bales and the 1921-1925 average of 882,000 bales, but were substantially under the average of 1,042,000 in 1926-1930. In 1931-1934, the United States supplied 69 percent of Italy's gross imports of raw cotton, as compared to 71 percent in 1926-1930 and 64 percent in 1922-1925. Statistics for 1935 are not yet available.

A number of postwar states of Europe particularly Czechoslovakia and Poland are fairly important importers of cotton while imports of some of the other smaller cotton consuming countries such as Spain, Netherlands, Sweden and Portugal, have shown increases in 1931-1935 when compared with other postwar years.

As previously indicated, Japan has superseded the United Kingdom during the last six years as the world's largest importer of cotton. Average net imports of cotton into Japan during 1931-1935 stood at 3,438,000 bales, which was considerably more than double the prewar, 1909-1913, average of 1,405,000 bales, and a substantial increase over the 1921-1925 average of 2,496,000 bales and the 1926-1930 average of 3,013,000 bales. The United States, which was the principal source of supply of Japanese imports of raw cotton, furnished 55 percent of the total imports in 1931-1935 as compared with 42 percent in 1926-1930 and 51 percent in 1921-1925.

During the years preceding the World War, 1909-1913, China was on a net export basis in cotton, net exports during these years averaging 197,000 bales per annum. Since the World War, with a pronounced development in cotton manufacture in that country, China has been on a net import basis. In 1931-1935, net imports averaged 566,000 bales, against an average of 437,000 bales in 1926-1930 and 211,000 bales in 1921-1925. The United States supplied 63 percent of China's total imports of raw cotton in 1931-1935 against an average of 29 percent in 1926-1930 and 12 percent in 1921-1925.
